Three commercial observations from ProfitPulse

01
Three growth fronts, one balance sheet

In under two years Paire has added two Melbourne retail stores to its online business and opened its first international wholesale accounts in Singapore and Malaysia. Each channel carries its own cost structure: retail fit out and staffing, wholesale margin and freight, online customer acquisition. Without a channel by channel view, it is easy to keep funding the loudest growth story rather than the most profitable one.

02
Inventory is the quiet cash risk

Apparel businesses scaling into new stores and new export markets at the same time typically see cash tied up in stock rise faster than revenue, since every new store and every new wholesale partner needs its own opening stock position. A Working Capital Unlock exercise would show exactly how much cash sits in stock today and where it can be released without starving the next store opening.

Nine times revenue growth deserves a costed plan

Revenue has grown roughly ninefold since 2021, reaching $9.4 million in FY25 on 64 percent growth, following 88 percent growth the year before. That is the profile of a business ready for a formal twelve month growth plan, ranking retail expansion, wholesale scaling, and new product lines by expected return for the team and for any future funding partner.

These observations are offered in good faith. Paire has built something genuinely impressive in four years. The question is simply whether the operating and capital plan is keeping pace with three simultaneous growth fronts.
