National Media: Three commercial observations from ProfitPulse

01

Nine event brands, one financial picture

National Media runs nine or more distinct event brands across food and hospitality, workplace health and safety, construction, and accommodation technology. With $18.4 million in revenue across this portfolio, the aggregate 42 percent growth headline looks strong. The question that matters at this stage is whether that growth is distributed evenly or concentrated in a few events carrying the rest. In most multi brand businesses, two or three products generate the bulk of the real margin while others absorb shared overhead without full visibility.

02

Each new launch commits capital before revenue arrives

Mark Harvey's strategy of organic growth via new event launches, stated publicly at the SISO CEO Summit, means the portfolio is actively expanding. FutureBuild Australia at ICC Sydney in June 2026 is the most recent addition. Each launch commits venue deposits, exhibitor acquisition spend, and team time before the first stand is sold. Without a clear view of which existing events produce the strongest returns, capital allocation for new launches defaults to experience and instinct rather than evidence.

The next 42 percent requires deliberate capital allocation

With nine or more event brands running across three states and an active launch strategy, the financial complexity of the portfolio is rising. Deciding which shows to scale, which to price more assertively, and which to rationalise requires an objective ranking of every event by gross margin and contribution. The Product and Service Line Profitability review produces exactly that: every brand ranked by financial performance in three weeks, built from management accounts, delivered as a clear action list.

These observations are offered in the spirit of a genuine commercial conversation. National Media has built something impressive over three decades. The question is simply whether the financial intelligence behind the portfolio matches the ambition of the growth strategy.
