Three commercial observations from ProfitPulse

01

Revenue velocity needs a financial map to match it

Taskforce grew revenue from $9.7 million to $12.8 million in one year, a 32 percent increase on top of 26 percent the year before. That trajectory is verifiably compounding across two independent Smart50 citations. At this pace, every resourcing and client onboarding decision compounds financially. The architecture that should sit behind compounding growth includes a margin model by service line, a capacity analysis for the team, and a capital allocation plan that maps each growth scenario in dollar terms.

The housing division is the edge. A financial map confirms it.

The housing division has been publicly identified as the strongest and most profitable segment of the business. Yet without a line-level profitability analysis, the capital allocation case for accelerating housing sits on instinct rather than numbers. Understanding the true margin by service line changes every resourcing, pricing, and sales focus decision. This is the financial work that turns a strong instinct into a deliberate and defensible strategy with a clear financial outcome.

03

High revenue per head signals a coming capacity inflection

With 19 people and $12.8 million in revenue, the revenue per head ratio is well above average for a services business. That is a mark of an exceptional technology platform. It is also a signal that a ceiling on further growth without structural change is approaching. A strategic growth diagnostic maps exactly where that ceiling sits, what the next team or technology investment needs to look like, and what three scenarios for the next 12 months look like in dollar terms so the decision to grow is made deliberately rather than reactively.
